The principal task of the clinician in treating patients with leukemia is to define the type of therapy that will be most successful. The classification of patients according to the risk for relapse and/or death is a vital step in assessing the prognosis for each individual patient. Recently several studies have suggested that CR without certain markers is too optimistic a prognostic indicator. In patients with acute myelogenous leukemia, the achievement of CR in one or more of the peripheral blood, bone marrow or liver is significantly correlated with a good prognosis. The best long-term result is obtained if patients achieve CR in two of three cytogenetic systems (Chronic Granulocytic Leukemia, Ph1, Ph2). There is now a strong case for the modification of therapy for all acute lymphoblastic leukemia in the B1 or B2 immunophenotype. 50b96ab0b6
